Then they staggered, and atumbled on again, till they both sank into a deep snowdrist.

They extracted themselves, but, on when they felt the deep cold snow all round them, it was a foretaste of the grave.

CHAPTER XI.—CONTINUED.

Then he showed her, in the valley, one of those delightful old red brick houses, with white atone facings. 'That is Bolitipshope.'

She looked at him with polite interest. 'Do you like it?'

Very much. It warms the landscape so.'

He way seried a more received and studied on, not not with any hope of extricating them merely lo keep the blood alive in their views.

And, when they were exhausted, they sat down, and soon became heaps of snow.

of snow.

While they sat thus, side by side, thinking no more of love, or any other thing but this: should they ever see the sun rise, or sit by a fireadle again? suddenly they heard a sound in the air behind them, and, in a moment, what seemed a pack of hounds in fall cry, passed close over their heads.

Thay uttered a loud cry,

"We are saved! cred Grace. 'Mr. Raby is hunting us with his dogs.—
That was the ccho.'
Coventry grouned. 'What seem! He expected a more prostac answer; but he took her one. I wish it was a great deal prettier than it is, and its owner a much better man; richer— winer viser—' 'You are hard to please, Mr. Coven-·Miss Carden-Grace-may I call you race?'
'It seems to me you have done it.'
'But I had no right.'
'Then, of course, you will never do it gain.'

That was the echo.'
Coventry groaned. 'What seen would lie?' said he, 'Those hounds were in the air; a hundred strong.'
Neither spoke for a moment, and then it was Grace who broke the ter-again.

'I should be very unhappy if I thought that. Miss Carden, I think you know how dear you are to me, and have been ever since I first met you. I wish I had ten 'times more to offer you than I have. But I am only a poor gentleman, of good descent, but moderate means, asyou see.' Comedie! (Boilinghope was the sort of house that generally goes with £5,000 a yearst least.) then it was Grace who broke the terrible silence.

"The Gabriel hounds; that run before calamity! Mr. Coventry, there's nothing to be done now, but to make our peace with God. For you are a dead man, and I'm a dead woman. My poor papa! poor Mr. Little!"

She kneeled down on the snow, and prayed patiently, and prepared to deliver up her innocent soul to Him who gave it.

Not so her companion. He writhed away from death. He groaned, he sighed, he oursed, he complained. What was Raby thinking of, to let them perish?

Presently he shouted out—'I'll not die this dog's death, I will not. I'll save myself, and come back for you.

The girl prayed on, and news heeded him.

But he was already on his fet, and icast.)
'I don't care about your means, Mr.
Coventry, 'said Grace, with a lofty smile
'It is your amiable character that I es-teem.'

But he was already on his feet, and set off to run; and he actually did go blundering on, for a forlong or more and fell into a mountain stream, ewol Mr. Coventry loved her sincerely, and his own heart beat high at his moment, He argued well from her sgitation; but presently he saw something that puzzled him.

A tear forced its way between her dogers, another, and another, soon followed. blundering on, for a furiong or more, and fell into a mountain stream, swollen by floods, which whirled him along with it, like a feather. It was not deep enough to drown him by submersion, but it rolled him over and over again, and knocked him against the rocks and stones, and would have infallibly destroyed him, but that a sudden, sharp turn in the current drove him, at last, against a projecting tree, which he clutched, and drow himself out with infinite difficulty. But, when he tried to walk, his limbs gave way; and he sank, fainting, on the ground, and the remorselessanow soon covered his prostrate body.

All this time, Grace Carden was kneeling on the snow, and was, literally, a heap of snow. She was patient and composed now, and felt a gentle sleep stealing over her.

That sleep would have been her death. But, all of a sudden, something heavy touched her clothes, and startled her, and two dark objects passed her.

The summent it darked through her mind that animals are wiser than men in some things. She got up with difficulty, for her limbs were stiffened, and followed them.

The dark forms struggled on before. They knew the ground, and soon took her to the edge of that very stream and strong feeling he was on his guard, and said nothing.

It was his wisest course. She was left to herself, and an amazing piece of female logic came to Mr. Coventry's aid. She found herself crying, and got frightened at herself. That, which made a man pause, had just the opposite effect on her. She feit that no good could come to anybody of those wild and weak regrets that made her weep. She saw she had a weakness and a folly to cure herself of; and the cure was at hand. There was a magic in marriage; a gentleman could, somehow, make a girl love him whence once she had married him. Mr. Coventry should be enabled to make her love him; he should cure her of this trick of crying; it would be the best thing for everybody—for him, for Jael, for Mr. Coventry, and even for herself.

She dried her eyes, and said, in a low.

even for herseif.

She dred her eyes, and said, in a low, tremulous voice: 'Have you spoken to paps of—of this?'

'No. I waited to be authorized by yon. May I speak to him?'

'Yes.'

'May I tell him—'

'Oh. I can't tell you what to tell him. How dark it is getting. Please take me home.' Another tear or two. Then, if Coveniry had not loved hers incerely, and also been a man of the world, he would have lost his temper, and it he had lost his temper, he would have sized the first fair opportunity to quarrel. But no, he took her hand gently, and set himself to comfort her. He poured out his love to her, and promised her alfe of wedded happiness. He fews odelightful a picture of wedded life, and in a voice so winning, that she began to be consoled, and her tears ceased. 'I believe you love me,' she murmored; 'and I esteem you sincersity.'

Mr. Coventry draw a family ring from his pocket. It was a sapphire or uncommon beauty. 'This was my mother's,' said he, 'Will you do me the honor to wear it as a pledge?'

Eut the actual fetter startled her, I hink.. She started up, and said, 'Oh, blease take me home it'st! 'R is going to said.'

Call her slippery, if, you don't like think. She started up, and said, 'Oh, please take me home list! It is going to snow, Call her slippery, if you don't like her; call her unbappy and wavering, if you do like her.

Mr. Coventry smiled now at this attempt to put off the inevitable, and complisd at once.

But before they had gone a hundred yards, the snow did 'really fail, and so passily that the air was darkened.

We had better go back't to the shed till it is over,' said Mr. Coventry.

'Do you think so ?' said Grace, doubtfailly, 'Weil.'

And they went back.

But the snow did not abate, and the sir got darker. So, by-the-by, Grace suggested, that Mr. Coventry should ran down the hill, and send Goorge up to her with an umbrells.

'What, and leave yon slone?' said her.

What, then, we had better go together.

By this time the whole ground was covered about three inches deep; not enough to impede their progress; but it had the unfortonate 'effect of effacing the distinct features of the ground; and as the declining sun could no longer struggle successfully through the armosphere which, was, haif air, half show, they were almost in darkness, and soon lost their way. They kept shanting unconsciously to the left, till they got over one of the forks of the mountain and lute a rayline; they managed to get out of that, and continued to descend; for the great thing they had to do was to reach the valley, no matter where.

But, after a long, laborlous, and even dangerous descent, they found the church door. It had the after a long, laborlous, and even dangerous descent, they found there would have before the sound and long and the dark and white cheek could be an adverted by the same and and a rayline; they managed to get out of that, and continued to descend; for the great thing they had to do was to reach the valley, no matter where.

But fafter a pulled toward the sound the church door. But by the fire way. They keep the managed to with all his soul, and then drew them to his bosom to warm theem; and drew ther head to his heart to warm her; and all with pretty moans of love, and fear, and pity; and the tears rained out of his eyes at the sight of her helpless condition, and then the tears fell upon her brow and hands; and all his vitality and love soon electrified her; she opened har eyes, and amiled faintly, but such a smile, and murmured 'It's you,' and closed her eyes again. dangerous descent they found them-selves beginning to ascend. Another mountain or hill barred their progress. Then they knew they must be all wrong, and began to feel rather anx-ious. They wished they had staid up on the hill.

on the hill.

They consulted together, and agreed to go on for the present; it might be not go on for the present; it might be not go on for the present. After awhile they found themselves descending again. But now the path was full of pitfalls, nidden by the snow and the darkness. Mr. Coventry lusiated on going first. In this order they moved cautiously no, often stambling. ed her eyes, and amiled fainily, but auch a smile, and murmured '11's you,' and closed her eyes again.

Then he panted out, 'Yes, it is I—a friend. I won't hart you—I won't tell you how I love you any more—only live! Don't give way: You shall marry who you like. You shall never be thwarted, nor worried, nor made love to sgain; only be brave and live; don't rob the world of the only angel that is in it. Have mercy, and live! I'll never ask more of you than that. Oh, how pale! I am frightened. Cursed fires, have you no warmth fa you? And he was at the bellows again. And the next moment back to her, imploring her, and sighing over her, and saying the drollest things, such as only those who love can say, in moments when heatts are bursting.

How now? Her cheek that was so white is pink—pinker—red—scarlet. She is blusning.

She had closed her eyes at Love's cries. Perhaps she was not altogether unwilling to hear that divine music of the heart, so long as she was not bound to reply and remonstrate—being insensible.

But now she speaks faintly, but clear. on, often stumbling.

This, however, was impossible, and all he could do was to scramble along the bottom of the ravine.

Grace kept on the high ground, and they called to each other every moment. They seemed to be a long way from each other; yet they were never sixty yards apart. At last the descent moderated, and Grace rejoined him.

Then they kept in the hollow for some time, but at last found another acclivity to mount; they tolled up it, laden with anow, yet perspiring profusely with the exertion of toiling up hill through heather clogged with heavy anow. sible.

But now she speaks faintly, but clearly, 'Don't be frightened. I promise not to die. Pray don't cry so.' Then she put out her hand to him, and turned her head away, and cried herself, gently, but plenteously.

Henly, kneeling by her, clasped the hand she lent him with both of his, and drew it to his panting heart in cestacy. Grace's cheeks were rosy red.

They remained so a little while in allence.

Henry's heart was too fall of bean. and through neather clogged with heavy snow.

They reached the summit, and began to descend sgain. But now their hear is began to quake. Men had been to to calrahope before to day, and never found alive; and they were lost on Calrahope, buried in the sinuosities of the mountain, and in a tremendous anow storm.
